Everyday Actions to THAW the Chilling Effect of

ICE

(and build community)

Why it Matters

Fear of immigration enforcement changes how people act, even when ICE isn't there.

This fear can spread throughout the community--people stop going to school or work and even avoid going to the doctor.

When people stay at home and out of public places, trust breaks down, community life contracts, and folks become isolated and are even more at risk.

Show your support

...

Simply wearing a shirt, hat, or button that clearly shows that you support fairness, dignity, and belonging for all human beings helps others feel safe and less alone.

Be brave in small ways

It can feel awkward to stand out, but small acts of courage matter.

When one person speaks up or leads by example, it makes it easier for others to do the same.

At its core, Community is a shared commitment to collective joy, one another's humanity, and the ongoing work of care.

These actions help make that commitment lived, visible, and easy to build on over time.

Go places together

Run errands, attend events, or simply spend time in public with friends and neighbors. Walk, bike, or take public transit when possible.

Being outside and visible together builds confidence and helps everyone feel supported.

Look out for each other

Say "hello", check in, offer help, and be kind in everyday moments.

Community grows when we notice each other and choose to care even when we don't always agree.
